CHANGE of PRACTICE NIGHT

DON FELLOWS

Friends and family packed the little church of Holy Rood, at Edwalton near Nottingham, for the service of celebration and thanksgiving for the life of Don Fellows who died on 21st January 2012. Don rang for many years in St Albans, first at St Stephen's and later at St Peter's, before moving away in 1996 following his retirement. Several family members offered their personal reminiscences and tributes to Don during the service, reflecting on his strong Christian faith, his grit and determination, his generous hospitality and loyal friendship, his enthusiasm for motorbikes (riding them, dismantling them and rebuilding them) and his enjoyment of the company of his grandchildren and great-grandchildren, including teaching them to play snooker and giving them advice on courting!

While at St Peter's, Don sat on the Fabric Committee and was a churchwarden, including during the period of the restoration of the bells in 1993. In his new parish, he continued to help in many practical ways: re-laying the path through the churchyard, fixing the lawnmowers and repairing the candlesticks.

Don encouraged new ringers and helped teach the learners at St Peter's, including several who are still ringing in the District today. When he moved to Edwalton, the band lacked experienced ringers so he helped its members consolidate and develop their skills and latterly, he had been the tower captain.

Even having moved, Don would join St Peter's outings, with his wife Eileen and it was during the one to Nottinghamshire in 1999 that Neil and I first met them. The following year, the St Peter's band spent a week ringing in the Channel Islands and we got to know each other better. Thereafter, it was a pleasure to see them on a number of outings, as well as on a ringing holiday in Ireland in 2006. We also spent a couple of weekends with them in Edwalton, when in addition to the local practice, Don took us ringing for services at West Bridgford and St Mary's in Nottingham city centre.

Don rang seven peals between 1962 and 2003, including one at St Stephen's and four at St Peter's, but a glance at the Campanophile website suggests that, over the last few years, he had been an enthusiastic quarter peal ringer, at least until quite recently, still achieving "firsts" at the age of 81.

Alison Evans

Don Fellows learnt to ring at Rushall (6) West Midlands and later when he moved to Hertfordshire became a member of St. Stephen's ringers, St. Albans from 1961 – 1970, before he left to raise a family. He then came back to ringing at St. Peters in 1983 where we were fortunate to have him as a valued member of the band as numbers were low. He took on teaching the learners, a job that requires patience, friendly attitude and commitment and Don had all of these qualities. He was also churchwarden and both he and his wife Eileen were members of the congregation. In December each year Don and Eileen would host the home band to a beer, bangers and mash evening after the practise.

They moved to Edwalton on the south side of Nottingham in 1995 where he took up ringing and one of the neighbouring towers at West Bridgford was where he was married. Several ringers were often made welcome especially if they were able to dig out his new fish pond. One of his other hobbies was his large collection of classic motorbikes which took up the entire garage.

ST MICHAELS, ST ALBANS AND A VISIT FROM RORY McGRATH

As Tower Secretary, one gets used to fielding phone calls enquiring about ringing at St Michael's but, at the end of June last year, I received one that was different from all the others. It was from a film producer working on a programme about the history and archaeology of The Six Bells pub in St Albans. He wanted to know whether it would be possible to film the presenter of the programme having a go at bell ringing, on the grounds that this would be a good way of talking about the close historical links between the pub and the church. And the presenter? Rory McGrath.

The following day, I met the producer in the tower, showed him the church and the bells, demonstrated ringing up and ringing down and explained that it wouldn't really be possible for Rory to ring a bell in the normal way if he didn't already know what he was doing but that he could have a go at chiming one in the down position. The band agreed that they were interested in pursuing the project but, although the film company had been working with the pub landlord for many months to make the necessary arrangements, they had left themselves only a fortnight before the planned date for filming to get permission from the church. The churchwardens made it clear that nothing could go ahead without their authorisation so I put "filming in church" into Google and found a link to the website for the Diocese of St Albans setting out a number of strict requirements which it said would need to be met before permission for filming would be given. Somehow, however, the film company managed to persuade the Archdeacon and the Vicar to give the go-ahead in what I suspect was record time!

The format of the show was that a couple of pits would be dug in the pub car park and a team of archaeologists would spend a week excavating and analysing what they found. To fit in with this, it was agreed that the film crew would visit the tower on practice night that week.

Rory was absolutely charming. He has a very good memory and made a point of learning all the band members' names. In the ringing chamber, he had a go at chiming the six, although once he got it swinging he had a tendency to catch the sally too early, stopping it from sounding. So he declared himself very impressed when we rang the bells up and then some changes were called.

In all, the film crew were with us for about three quarters of an hour, although in the final programme our bit took a little over a minute to watch! Pub Dig was aired in November on The History Channel but is due to be repeated on Channel Five in the spring. More information, including clips and photographs, is available at <http://www.history.co.uk/shows/pub-dig.html>
